“if art is produced as an outcome of certain conditions rather than simply an act of genius, then creating such conditions would actually produce art.

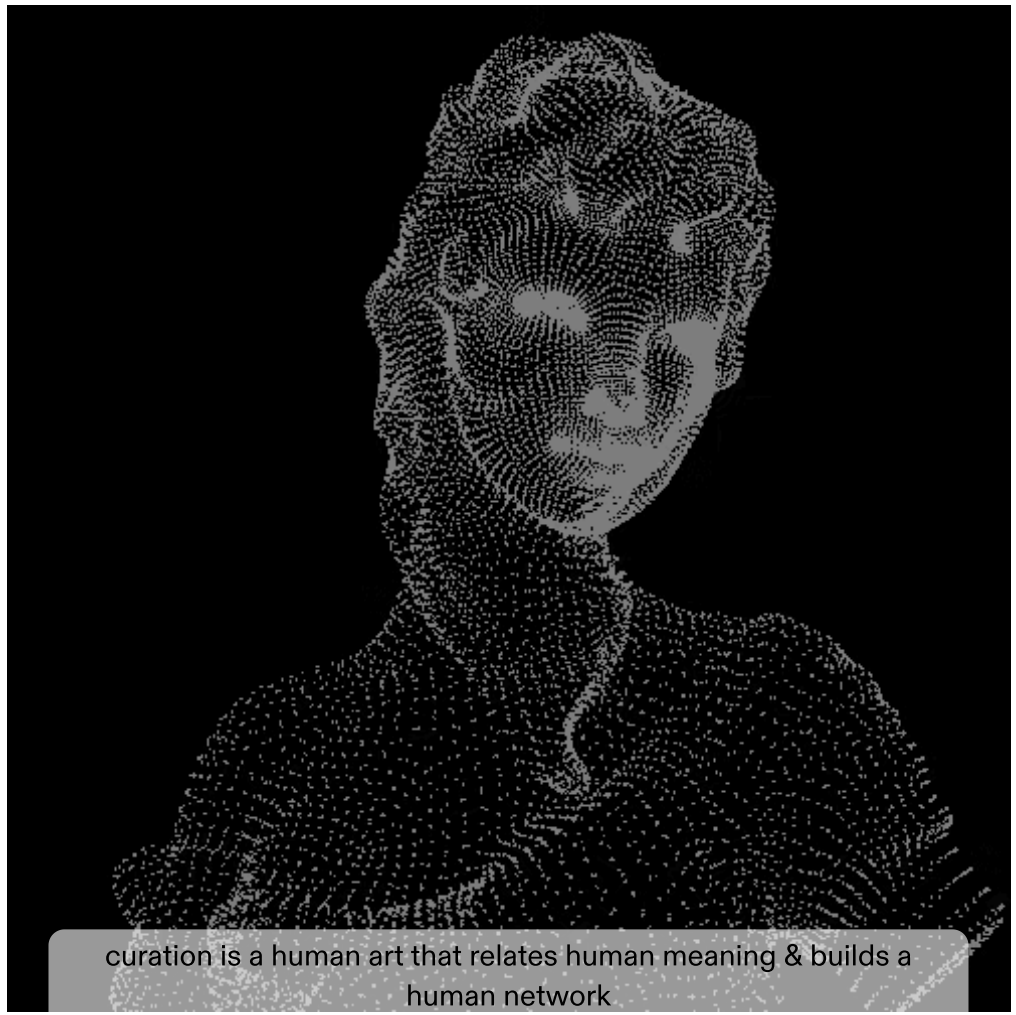

If ultimate conditions of production are in the world or life, rather than studio or an art museum, it would then follow that a certain way of living, of being in the world would itself result in the production of art.

No work is necessary.”

How did you envision the practice?

Emily Segal: The idea has always been to use our relationships with clients as a way to stockpile different concepts and ideas, which we then use to engage a network of people we know, and produce independent projects, creating a discursively generative practice in its own right. In that sense, it was similar to some of what K-HOLE was doing, and conceptually, it all tied into certain ideas in Martti's work: design strategy, architecture, urbanism. But Nemesis is different from what either of us had done before, in that it's not an art project—it's a business. It's really a hybrid, actually —an agency, an intellectual endeavor and even a publishing project. But it's not 'Art' with a capital 'A,' which is important.

There were two different types of meetings: research meetings and production meetings. For the research meetings, we would just look at things that we liked for hours — music videos, pictures, stuff that we found on the internet. We would find all this ephemera online and obsess over it and try to really articulate to each other what was evocative about it. Then we would get into brainstorming mode about what we wanted to explore, and one person would talk while another took notes. We'd do that for a few sessions and we'd go through it, try and organize it into some sort of structure, and we'd split the structure into parts and assign one to each person to write.

Then we would bring it all back together, read it through endlessly, talk through it, rewrite it. Eventually it would seem crystallized enough that we would start to match it up with imagery.

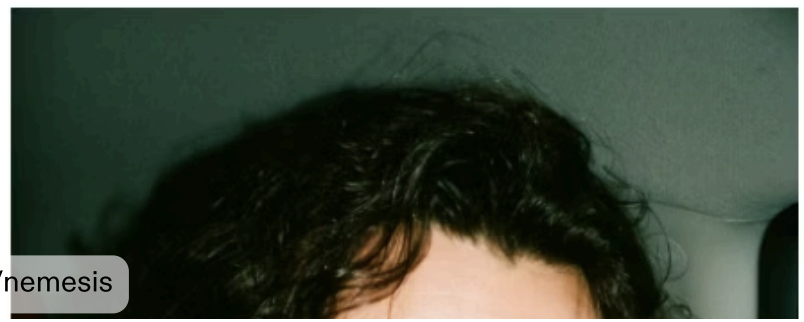

So, what kind of services does Nemesis offer?

Martti Kalliala: Besides our independent work, we do brand strategy, creative direction and cultural research. But not everything is meant for public consumption. So far, we've done several in-depth reports building on cultural research, on topics ranging from travel to sex to spectacle in the age of mass fame. That's maybe our main service—but we've also been working in the role of outsider creative director, being more hands on with design strategy and design consultancy.

Is it typically geared towards developing one-off campaigns? Or is it more along the lines of comprehensive identity branding?

Emily Segal: Both. We've done cultural reports and trend reports, where we take a certain topic from a particular client, gather our research and have structured conversations around it, offering our perspective. But then the other, more involved side would be something like design strategy on the level of identity branding, or campaigns, or products. With a few of our client relationships, it's been somewhere in-between, where it will start with a report, then get into discussions as to how those ideas might be implemented, and ultimately lead to a kind of creative director's role from there.
